With what's going on, the best video chat apps are now more valuable than ever. We're all cut off from our friends and family thanks to the pandemic, but there's a lot of software out there that can keep us all together. No matter if you prefer the desktop or mobile experience, there's something for everyone. Even better, much of it is free. We've rounded up a list of the best video chat apps available for download right now. Whether you're working from a desktop, Android, iPhone, or if you need something that allows you to chat during PC gaming marathons. You may have some already, but you didn't know all the different things he could do. If you want something for a more professional environment or feel like recovering one of your friends, these are your best options. Read on for our highlights of the best video chat apps on a multitude of platforms. And if you're against spending money, don't worry: every software on this list has at least one free tier — and most of them are totally free, period. What are the best video chat apps? The best video chat app overall — and one that is particularly popular now — is Zoom Meeting, which can be used on both desktop and mobile devices. Zoom is available in free and paid tiers. The free option supports calls of up to 100 attendees, although sessions with three or more people on the line are limited to 40 minutes and can also run within a desktop browser window if you don't want to download the app to your computer. Skype is a good alternative to Zoom. It's a bit easier to use, but it also works on various platforms and doesn't cost anything at first. It also allows you to call landlines and cell numbers at reasonable rates, supports SMS, and can also conduct real-time translations. Google Duo is an app that is pre-installed on the vast majority of Android phones these days and has essentially become Google's answer to Apple's FaceTime on iPhone. It's easy to use, just like FaceTime, and offers a quick shortcut to calling in built-in Google Home devices. Facebook also has two solutions on offer: Facebook Messenger and WhatsApp. Video call features from both apps saw an increase from 8 to 50 participants last spring. Finally, we recommend Discord for players, which offers robust apps on mobile and desktop devices. In fact, Discord is designed to stream games to small groups of people, and the company recently increased the limit of its free streaming service Go Live from 10 to 50 people. Here's a closer look at all the best video chat apps. The best video chat apps you can download today (Image Credit: Zoom) Works with: iOS, Android, Windows, Mac, Web | Maximum number of users: Time limit for 3 or more: Duo for friends and colleagues Comprehensive feature set Works on all platforms Free level imposes time limits for 3 or more people A of the best video chat apps many people turn to these days is Zoom and for good reason. Zoom is popular among professional teams, although it is it becomes more common for simple video chats thanks to its wide set of features and support on all platforms, both as a local and web app on desktops and as a downloadable app on smartphones. Screen sharing, live annotations, and encryption are all standard with Zoom, whether you're using the free version of the app or deciding to pay. If you're simply chatting on video with another friend, the free app doesn't block anything from you. This changes, however, when you decide to invite three or more people to the meeting, at which point you have a time limit of 40 minutes. A $15-a-month Pro tier lifts that restriction so you can have up to 100 people on the same call, while the Business tier increases that limit even more for business customers. It must be said that a number of Zoom security flaws have been discovered since the app came under the spotlight during the first days of the pandemic. However, Zoom is facing them and we still recommend it as safe to use for the vast majority of people, as long as you password protect each meeting. The April Zoom 5.0 update ensured that the app now complies with the 256-bit GCM AES encryption standard and enforces passwords by default for professional license holders and educators. More recently, the company has turned on end-to-end encryption to keep calls more secure, and all of this should do a lot to curb Zoom bombardment. (Image credit: Skype) Works with: iOS, Android, Windows, Mac, Web, Xbox | Maximum number of free users: 50 Max 50 people allowed in video call Support international calls and text Available on all platforms The business level costs money Yes has been a name in the list of the best video chat apps for a long time. Microsoft's offering has an impressive limit of 50 people and doesn't cost you anything. Like Zoom, Skype also has a browser client and is available on pretty much every modern compatible device and smartphone. It is also suitable for connecting to people who don't have their own devices and maybe are limited to landline phones or a basic mobile phone. Since Skype supports international calls and SMS, it is a complete solution for friends and family countries. If you have specific needs, such as sharing your screen on mobile devices or transcription and live translation, Skype also covers those basics. The paid version of the business app has been reformulated as Microsoft Teams, but you won't need to use it if all you use it for is chatting with friends. (Image credit: Google) Works with: iOS, Android, Windows and Mac via web | Maximum free users: 32 Preinstalled on most new Android phones When and fun to use For a completely free people limit 32 is smaller than most For longer time, didn't get its answer to FaceTime on iPhone and iPad — a built-in video chat app that users could easily turn right on their device, without having to look for something on the Play Store (and ask their friends to download it, too). Thankfully, Google has finally addressed this issue with — video chat software that is remarkably easy to use and actually accessible within the Standard Phone app on many Android phones. Duo also supports a number of fun features and allows you to record and send video messages, so you can connect to friends and family, even when they're not available at the same time. Duo is also available on iOS, so friends who cough on iPhone don't have the right to shame you for not owning an Apple handset. It also has the same limit of 32 people as Facetime these days. A recent report stated that Google is planning to fold Duo into Meet, which was initially intended more for business users, although it is unclear when this might occur. (Image credit: Discord) Works with: iOS, Android, Windows, Mac, Web | Maximum number of free users: 10 on video call; 50 streaming Great for games Robust PC and mobile apps Lac more work-optimized features Players already know Discord as a great resource to connect with their friends via text, but did you know that Discord also supports video chat? Also, since it allows streaming in the app itself, it's a great way to play some games with friends, streaming a user's screen content to the rest of the group. In fact, Tom's Guide staff did it exactly several times during quarantine, with one user sharing Quplash from their PC display to the rest of us playing by phone. Thankfully, Discord has even gone so far as to temporarily increase its integrated streaming service Go Live from up to 10 people to 50 people. If you upgrade to Nitro, which costs $10 per month, you can increase streaming quality to 1080p/60fps, compared to a maximum of 720p/30fps for the free tier. (Image credit: Vincenzo Pinto/Getty Images) Works with: iOS, Mac | Maximum free users: 32 Supports up to 32 people in a video call Built into every iPhone, iPad and Mac FaceTime Audio simplifies voice calls, even Accessible only on Apple devices It is not surprising that FaceTime should appear in this list of the best video chat apps. Apple's software wasn't the first in video chat, but it was the one that started everything for mobile users and led the industry to make video chat easier and more accessible. Today, FaceTime is pre-installed on all Apple hardware and supports a number of really fun and useful features, from cute Animojis, Memojis and stickers to allowing up to 32 people in a single call. And because FaceTime also has a voice calling component — FaceTime Audio — you can easily route calls via data or Wi-Fi whenever you want, where your conversations will sound infinitely better than they seem on your phone provider's voice network. The only downside to FaceTime is of course that it's exclusive to Apple hardware. But of all the people who own iPhones, iPads, and Macs these days, it shouldn't be hard to find someone facetime with. (Image credit: Facebook) Works with: iOS, Android, Windows and Mac via web | Maximum number of free users: 50 Ubiquitous Available on web and phone Max 50 50 allowed in video call Laccia features friendlier to work The beauty of using Facebook Messenger for video chat is that you've probably already registered to use it. As long as you have a Facebook account and Facebook Messenger app on your phone (or you're signed in to the Facebook Messenger web app on your computer), you can start chatting videos with your Facebook friends right away. Even if you had a Facebook account at the same time and have turned it off ever since, you can still use Messenger. Just tap on the small camera icon in the upper right corner of the screen, and you can start a call with an individual or chat group. And just like Skype, up to 50 people can be featured on a Facebook Messenger video call at the same time — a good view above the top 32 video chatters supported by Apple's FaceTime and Google Duo media. Also, even during video chat, you can still use the myriad of other Facebook Messenger features, such as sending chat messages, stickers, and so on. (Image credit: WhatsApp) Works with: iOS, Android | Maximum free users: 50 end-to-end encrypted group calls for 50 people This video calls limited to mobile WhatsApp is one of the most popular messaging alternatives on smartphones today, either because it's a shot to only join a phone number and because many of your friends and family are probably already using it (or at least have an account). Until recently, WhatsApp's video calling feature wasn't the most robust out there. But that changed once the maximum participant limit was increased to 50, thanks to an integration with Facebook Messenger's new Rooms feature. The only downside of the WhatsApp video suite is that although WhatsApp offers desktop and web apps, video chat is limited to mobile app users. At least WhatsApp video calls are end-to-end encrypted, just like chat messages. In other words, you'll never have to worry about any of your conversations being intercepted by nefarious intruders. How to choose the best video chat app for you Why all the best video chat apps are free, you shouldn't be afraid to try each one if you wish. There is absolutely no risk. But if you want to know where to start, the best advice is to take stock of what you need this app for. If you're just trying to chat on your phone on your own, Duo, FaceTime, and Facebook Messenger will be enough. However, if you and your friends use a number of devices to connect you — phones, tablets, computers, and so on — or if your needs are more professional or collaborative, we recommend leaning on Zoom, Skype, or Discord. These apps are available on each platform, and while some of them offer paid tiers, you probably won't need to if the number of heads is small enough or the period of time you plan to chat is relatively short. Free versions are packed with features to begin with. Ultimately, you'll probably end up on any video chat app that your friends and family already prefer to use — that's how these things tend to go. But if you're looking for a one of the options on this list will hopefully be enough. Enough.
